Compensation and benefits administration is the day-to-day running of salaries, allowances and staff benefits: evaluating roles, setting grades, benchmarking salaries, administering schemes and keeping payroll data accurate. This one-week course on compensation and benefits administration and management is for HR officers who operate these processes, and it ends with each delegate building a grade structure and benefits administration file. Blackbird Training Centre runs this course in compensation and benefits administration.

Introduction

The course draws on three references. Point-factor evaluation scores each role against defined factors, such as know-how and accountability, to rank positions fairly. The WorldatWork Total Rewards Model groups what an employer offers into remuneration, benefits, well-being, development and recognition. Compa-ratio, a salary divided by its grade midpoint, shows where each salary sits within its range. The level is practitioner: delegates run or support salary and benefits processes and come to do them consistently and accurately. Teaching uses spreadsheet exercises and case studies from government agencies and hospital groups.

Course Objectives

- Distinguish a remuneration philosophy from a remuneration policy and apply both when answering salary queries.
- Compare ranking with point-factor evaluation and select the method suited to the size of the workforce.
- Apply salary survey data to benchmark roles and set midpoints for a grade structure.
- Compare broadbanding with narrow grades and interpret what each means for increments and progression.
- Interpret compa-ratios to identify salaries that sit too high or too low within their grade.
- Apply payroll controls that keep salary changes, allowances and benefits records accurate and traceable.

Target Audience

- HR officers who handle salary and benefits queries, deciding which rule applies to each case.
- Remuneration and benefits analysts, judging how survey data should set salary ranges.
- HR generalists in smaller organisations, choosing how to grade new and changed positions.
- Payroll and HR systems staff, deciding which salary changes need approval before processing.
- Benefits administrators handling medical, leave and retirement schemes, judging staff eligibility for each.

Course Outline

Day 1: Remuneration Basics and Policy

- Remuneration Philosophy vs Remuneration Policy: Guiding Principles Compared With Operating Rules

Skills You Will Gain

- Role description writing
- Point-factor scoring
- Salary survey matching
- Grade midpoint calculation
- Compa-ratio analysis
- Benefits eligibility administration
- Payroll change control

Why Attend This Course

- From grading new positions by comparison with similar titles to scoring them with a consistent evaluation method.
- From quoting survey figures without context to matching roles properly and choosing the right percentile.
- From handling benefits claims case by case to applying written eligibility rules for medical, leave and retirement schemes.
- From scattered spreadsheets to a grade structure and benefits administration file ready for HR and finance review.

Conclusion

In plain terms, compensation and benefits administration turns an employer's salary and benefits rules into accurate, consistent decisions for each member of staff. The course separates philosophy from policy, ranking from point-factor evaluation, and broadbanding from narrow grades. It suits HR officers, analysts and benefits administrators who run these processes every week, rather than senior HR leaders shaping a reward strategy for the whole organisation.

Course FAQs

What is compensation and benefits administration?

Compensation and benefits administration is the operational side of HR remuneration work: evaluating roles, maintaining salary grades, benchmarking against surveys, processing increments, administering medical, leave and retirement schemes, and keeping payroll records accurate.

What is the difference between broadbanding and narrow grades in compensation and benefits?

Broadbanding groups many roles into a few wide salary bands, giving managers room to move salaries without regrading. Narrow grades use more, tighter ranges, which give clearer progression steps but need regrading more often as roles change.

Which methods does compensation and benefits administration training follow?

The course uses point-factor evaluation for grading roles, the WorldatWork Total Rewards Model for grouping what staff receive, and compa-ratio and range penetration for checking where salaries sit within grades.

Is compensation and benefits administration training right for an HR officer?

Yes. An HR officer who answers salary queries, prepares increments or handles benefits claims uses these methods directly. A senior HR leader setting reward strategy for the whole organisation may find an advanced total rewards course a closer fit.

What do delegates produce in compensation and benefits administration training?

Each delegate builds a grade structure with salary ranges and midpoints for a sample set of roles, together with a benefits administration checklist covering eligibility rules, approval steps and payroll controls.
